Fund Manager's Report

During the month, the fund rose 4.83%, underperformed the benchmark by 1.40%.

Chinese equities rallied in May 2025 but underperformed other Asian markets. The market was supported by a large reduction in trade tariffs between the US and China on most goods and the announcement of a 90-day truce. China's manufacturing PMI hovered near contraction territory, reflecting ongoing export challenges. Domestically, policymakers unveiled more easing measures to support the economy. Domestic consumption remained a bright spot, with retail sales showing year-over-year growth, albeit slower than expected. The Taiwanese market was stronger, buoyed by its technology sector on renewed optimism about AI capex.

The temporary tariff reduction agreed between the US and China is a positive surprise, although the uncertainty level remains significant as negotiations continue. The process should extend beyond 90 days due to the intricate trade relationship between the two countries. Additional tariffs are also possible, especially if China fails to address US concerns over fentanyl imports.
